Positions in the construction industry pay an average of $37,000 annually, whereas entry level positions in other industries pay an average of only $26,000. [US Dept. of Labor Statistics]

There are few barriers in beginning a career in the construction industry. Most entry level positions require a high school diploma, and workers are generally paid while learning through apprenticeships.

In almost anything you do, you're more likely to succeed if you have a plan. Deciding on a career is no exception. If you're making a decision about education, training, or a career – or if you are helping someone else who is making such decisions – you need to know what is going on in the labor market. How many jobs are likely to be available in the career you want? How much will those jobs pay? What kind of training will you need?

3 business strategies that work ...

1. Make an inventory of your skill sets. Start by making a list of likes and dislikes. Then analyze your skills, experience and qualifications...

What would best suit your personality?

What are the skills that you have gained in your current job?

What are your strengths and weaknesses?

What responsibilities do you enjoy?

2. Update your resume. Highlight your most recent accomplishments and any qualifications you may have picked up, make sure to highlight key skills that prospective employers are seeking.

3. Spread the word about your job hunt to everyone you know, including family members, friends, professors and former co-workers. Also take advantage of professional networking Web sites and staffing companies that specialize in your field. Maintain a broad base of contacts in the local business community.

Just a few facts to consider.....

When choosing a career, jobseekers often want to know which occupations offer the best prospects.

Job openings for workers come from the need to replace workers who retire or leave an occupation permanently for other reasons.

The following are descriptions of the occupational group that have replacement needs.

Office & Administrative support - Workers in this group prepare and file documents, deal with the public and gather and distribute goods and information. Examples include secretaries, computer operators, and receptionists to mention a few.

Construction – This group includes workers in construction and building trades, such as carpenters and electricians. It also includes occupations in oil and gas extraction and mining, such as roustabouts and mining machines operations.

Installation, maintenance, and repair

Workers in this group install and maintain all types of equipment. The include service technicians, mechanics, computer repairers, industrial machinery mechanics, and millwrights

Labors

Workers in this group are considered in all the above mentioned jobs. They are the support system that moves industries forward.

We suggest that you bring...
